A: You can't use it as a backup server, but you can create a bootable iso from it which you can use to create a custom live usb on a real machine using some tools like this: Then, you can install Ubuntu on that USB and use the disk on the server as a bootable disk. The disadvantages are of course that this is in general slower than having a machine running Ubuntu installed in your own machine, and it's generally less secure if you have physical access to the machine you are using to create the USB, but in some situations it can be the best option. Author Topic: Generic Beer at the Pub (Read 4297 times) I went to the pub today and noticed that they had some generic beer. I was curious as to how the taste compared to normal or seasonal beer. It was a Hefe-Weizen, and I have no idea what kind. What would be the difference? It tasted fine, but it seemed like it was a bit stronger than I would have liked. Like, the taste of it was a bit harsh, or something. Does anyone know what kind of beer this was, or if it was actually a regular beer I would have like? It's hard to tell much of anything, from what I know of this beer, but it's more like a "light" beer. For reference, there's a Bud Light and a Michelob Light in the store that is always in the cooler. Maybe they changed up the list of beers that they stock for the summer? I just saw that they changed up the beer list, and they are just carrying regular beers. I bought a can of the Bud Light and a Michelob. I will tell you this, the Michelob actually tastes really good. The Bud Light, however, tastes like a straight-up Heine-Knevel. It's just a different, smoother taste. I just got tired of it in about a 82157476af
